About

How should institutional investors allocate capital to decarbonize real assets while preserving and enhancing long-term value?

The current challenge is not simply identifying the right technologies. It is making investment decisions in an environment shaped by evolving regulation, uncertain energy markets, technological change, and long investment horizons.

My work focuses on the intersection of engineering, finance, and policy to support portfolio-level capital allocation decisions for the decarbonization of real assets.

With a background spanning architecture, engineering, management consulting, and institutional real estate, I combine technical expertise with financial and strategic thinking to translate complex technical, financial, and regulatory considerations into practical investment decisions with a strong track record of projects across the Nordics.

- Portfolio decarbonization and CapEx strategies to reduce energy demand, enhance asset performance, manage transition risks, and while ensuring regulatory alignment through EPCs and the EU Taxonomy
- Corporate climate strategies, including carbon footprints, SBTi target setting, validation and progress reporting
- Physical climate risk assessments and resilience strategies for real assets
- Building electrification and energy systems, including evaluation of technology pathways and investment implications
- Asset and portfolio management, supporting long-term value creation through informed investment decisions
- Sustainability due diligence for real estate investments
